

Saving Ryan's Privates

At Lew Rockwell.com Pat Buchanan quotes University of Oxford professor Benjamin Jowett (1817-1893): “Never retreat. Never explain. Get it done and let them howl.” Donald Trump, writes Buchanan, “has internalized [that] maxim. ...And in rejecting demands that he apologize for his remarks about the La Raza judge presiding over the class-action suit against Trump University, the Donald is instinctively correct. Assume, as we must, that Trump believes what he said. Why, then, should he apologize for speaking the truth, as he sees it?”

“...When the British were serenely confident in the superiority of their tribe, faith, culture, and civilization, they went out and conquered and ruled and remade the world, and for the better. When they embraced the guilt-besotted liberalism that James Burnham called the ‘ideology of Western suicide,’ it all came down. The empire collapsed, the establishment bumbled its endless apologies for how wicked it had been, and the great colonial powers of Europe threw open their borders to the peoples they had colonized, who are now coming to occupy and remake the mother countries. But suddenly, to the shock of an establishment reconciled to its fate, populist resistance, call it Trumpism, seems everywhere to be rising.”

Three cheers for Mr. Buchanan for pointing out what should be obvious to everyone but which has been hidden for decades under the covers of political correctness and “civilization guilt.” No, the Brits should not be ashamed of having had an Empire. While Barack Obama hates “colonialism” with every skinny bone in his drug-addled body, the truth is that without the British Empire, India and Africa would still be fully without railroads, education, legal systems, hygiene, and shoes. Without the British Empire, Barack Hussein Obama, Sr. would have never left his herd of goats to become a bureaucrat in the British Protectorate that eventually became Kenya. Without the British Empire, the current temporary occupant of our White House would never have been born. Yet the thug-in-chief’s first official act upon entering the Oval Office and spotting a bust of Winston Churchill was to demand, “Get that Goddamned thing out of here!”

While an ever-decreasing number of non-immigrant Brits still exclaim, “God save the Queen!”, Trump has the audacity to say, “America first!”—prompting the political, media, and university establishments to first recoil in horror and then advance surreptitious schemes to deny the voters the opportunity to finally be represented, rather than ruled over. The frightened but defiant political establishment is determined to retain its power, while it destroys America’s soul with political correctness and global-warming claptrap that promote guilt over the nation’s greatness and wealth.

Europe, which is further along with its acts of self-destruction, provides a glimpse into America’s future if it continues on the same path. Germany has allowed the entry of more than one million Muslim migrants, a number that can in no way be reasonably accommodated, let alone assimilated—even if they wanted to assimilate (and they generally do not). Largely as a result of Muslim immigration, Sweden is becoming the rape capital of the world. In London, the most common name given to newborn males is Mohammed (or some variation of that spelling), and Subway restaurants are removing ham from their menus. In Italy, Christians are asked to pray quietly so as not to offend Muslims, while the Islamic call to prayer blares from loudspeakers several times each day. Streets in Paris are clogged with throngs of Mecca-facing men kneeling on the pavement, forcing detours for automobiles and trucks. In Nice, a French Riviera waitress is assaulted for daring to serve alcohol during Ramadan. (How would Europe react if millions of Japanese immigrants demanded the destruction of houses that are not sited according to Feng Shui customs?)

Amidst this capitulatory nonsense, Donald Trump defiantly says, “I will not let that happen to America!”—causing media leftists to shriek and politicians to wet their pants, while open-border, war-mongering neoconservatives serve up a columnist no one has ever heard of as their third-party choice to help give Hillary Rodham Clinton the Oval Office. The supposedly learned Bill Kristol placed his chips on a (David) French victory, oblivious to the fact that the French have never won much of anything. At the very least, however, we all learned that the tantrum-throwing writers at The Weekly Standard, National Review, and Townhall.com depend an awful lot on war stock dividends and illegal immigrant maid and lawn services.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-KY) and House Speaker Paul Ryan (R-WI), along with innumerable other unprincipled politicians pretending they act solely on principle, uttered not a word of condemnation when Vicente Fox insulted not only Trump but every legal American citizen with his “I’m not gonna pay for that fuckin’ wall!” remark. But they readily ran to the media microphones to condemn the billionaire real estate developer for suggesting that a Mexican-American judge might have a few drops of “wise Latino” in his blood.

In a 2001 speech at Berkeley College, then-appeals court judge Sonia Sotomayor said, “Whether born from experience or inherent physiological or cultural differences, our gender and national origins may and will make a difference in our judging. ... There is no objective stance but only a series of perspectives. ... Personal experiences affect the facts that judges choose to see.” The “justice is blind” concept is way down on the list of guiding principles for Sotomayor, who wants to rip the blindfold off Lady Justice and free her to issue rulings based on “a series of perspectives.” While media pundits and establishment politicians believe it is acceptable for Sotomayor to say that she and her fellow judges are naturally influenced by their ancestry and culture, it is not acceptable for a non-judge, like Trump, to point out the same thing by asking if Judge Gonzalo Curiel might occasionally peek from under his red, white, and green blindfold.

As has often been said over the last few months, if Republicans in the House and the Senate had stood up to Obama and Harry Reid as forcefully as they have resisted Trump, they could have had their President Romney in 2012 and The Donald would not even have entered the race in 2016. Now they are up against a candidate who is running as an American rather than as a Republican or a Democrat, and the elites have no idea what to do. Putting America first means putting deals, schemes, and kickbacks further down on the list. Giving voters priority is a new concept for them, and it will take, as Gonzalo, Vicente, and Sonia might perhaps say, some cojones to resist the lobbyists and donors. Meanwhile, rumor has it that there is a new movie about failed attempts to instill some patriotic courage in the loins of the Speaker. It’s called, Saving Ryan’s Privates.
